LAND OF DROUTHIE CRONIES.

Convivial Caledonia's Curious Inns and Hotels and Some Facts About Them.

Robert Kempt has gathered together many interesting historical items and quaint anecdotes about the inns and hotels of Scotland, says the Caterer. It must be confessed the historical side begins very late, for in olden days inns were practically unknown over the border, travelers being received in private houses as guests. Consequently there is no record of such ancient London hostels as the Tabard, in Southwark; the Mermaid, in Bread Street, or the Blue Boar, in Eastcheap. When De-foe went to Scotland he had difficulty in finding an inn at Aberdeen, and thus in spite of a royal edict issued by James I. in 1424, to the effect that in all borough towns where there was considerable traffic, hostels should be established, but these institutions did not flourish till very much later. Mr. Kempt gives some amusing information as to the pains and penalties enacted in the fifteenth and seventeenth centuries regarding the hours of closing, drunkenness, etc. The inns of Aberdeen are accorded a whole chapter, for there is much to say about those of the last century. They practically formed open clubs for the wits and learned men of the hospitable city. Over very modest repasts and potatoes, grand symposia were held; the philosophers lived low, but thought and spoke high.

Dr. Johnson seems to have appreciated the Aberdeen inns; he found them almost as congenial as his haunts in Fleet Street, and certainly far better than the Scottish houses of entertainment. Among other interesting items of information Mr. Kempt points out that whisky is a comparatively modern beverage, and that in olden days claret was almost as much drunk as ale. The Regent Albany is supposed to have made claret popular. In 1480 red Gascony wine sold in Aberdeen at sixpence a pint, and later on claret and port wine could be had at eightpence a bottle. Indeed, claret and port in those early days could be procured cheaper in Scotland than in most parts of England. In the cities and country side are many inns with historical interests attached to them. In the Invercauld Arms Hotel, Braemar, is the stone on which the standard of Mar was raised in 1745, the beginning of Prince Charles's wild escape. Other inns are associated with names venerated in Scottish history and literature. There are many inns in the Highlands closely connected with Burns, the Ettrick Shepherd, Sir Walter Scott, and other kindred giants of old. Scott mentions that it used to be the fashion to eat oysters in the Covenant Close, Edinburgh, and Mr. Kempt has gathered together many details as to this once fashionable form of indulgence. During the eighteenth century it seems that the best society in the Scottish capital, ladies and gentlemen, used to make parties at one of the taverns in "Auld Reekie," there to partake of oysters and porter, ending up with brandy and rum punch, with songs and dancing. Some of these old Aberdeens and Edinburgh inns were the ancient houses of noble families, great rambling buildings, with many rooms, some of remarkably fine proportions. Even a few of the country inns were former mansions of the lairds of the soil.

Wood Stone.
The manufacture of xylolith, or wood stone, has been undertaken on an extensive scale by a Dresden firm, and its use as a building material is said to be increasing. It is composed, in due proportions, of magnesia, cement, or calcined magnesite, mixed with sawdust, and saturated with a solution of chloride of calcium, the pasty mass, before the cement sets, being spread out into sheets of uniform thickness and subjected to great pressure, then dried. Tests made of chemical and mechanical qualities show that the dry material is much superior to the same soaked with water, dry specimens resisting a tendency of about 160 pounds per square inch, while pieces saturated with water resisted only two-thirds as much. Soaking the dry material in linseed oil increased the tensile strength about 14 per cent., and freezing diminished it slightly. The resistance to compression proves to be about 300 pounds to the square inch, this being diminished about 10 per cent by freezing and increased to about the same extent by careful drying and saturation with linseed oil. When immersed in water unbroken sheets of the perfectly dry material took up 2.1 per cent. of their weight of water in twelve hours, and 3.8 per cent. in 216 hours; broken pieces absorbed in the same time about 20 per cent. more water than the unbroken sheets. It is stated as a somewhat singular fact that, though this remarkable material was invented and brought to public notice more than ten years ago, until now has its value been made apparent.—Sun.

No Objections Offered.
A young man of Detroit, who writes poetry now and then, spent several weeks of the past summer in one of the interior towns, where he loafed around a newspaper office, and did up a number of local events in poetic measure. One day a prominent citizen died and a friend of his, who knew the young man and his poetry, called on the editor to see about a funeral notice.
"We have it in good shape," said the editor.
"All the facts?" inquired the friend.
"Yes, and a poem by our visiting poet from Detroit."
The friend began rubbing his chin in grave doubt.
"All right, all right," he exclaimed, brightening; "I suppose it will be safe enough for the young fellow; the man will be buried before the poem appears."

No American.
If a man is determined to be in the fashion nothing can stand in his way. Thus we read in Life:
"You will have to wear spectacles," said the oculist.
"I'd prefer a monocle," answered Chaplin.
"But both your eyes are affected."
"Then I shall wear two monocles."
